

How much money will I lose if I cancel my holiday with TUI?

The TUI cancellation cost depends on your booking timeline and travel date and it is calculated as a percentage of your total trip price. If you cancel early (around 70 days or more before departure) you usually only forfeit the initial deposit amount. As the departure date gets closer the cancellation fee increases which may reduce the amount returned to you.

For example cancellations made 69–63 days before travel may incur around 30% while 48–29 days before travel can reach up to 70% of the total booking cost. Near the final stages the charge can rise significantly and in some cases close to departure the entire booking value may be chargeable depending on the conditions of your travel plan.

To understand your exact outcome always check your manage booking details as each reservation has its own refund and cancellation rules. Acting earlier gives better control over your refund balance and flexibility options helping you reduce financial impact.

If you are planning a trip and suddenly need to cancel one of the first concerns is how much money you might lose. When it comes to cancelling a holiday with TUI the amount you get back is not fixed and depends mainly on how close you are to your departure date and the type of booking you made. In most cases cancellation charges are applied on a sliding scale meaning the closer you are to your travel date the higher the percentage you may lose.

TUI's cancellation rules are structured around time bands before departure. If you cancel well in advance typically 70 days or more before travel you may only lose your deposit. As the departure date gets closer the charges increase significantly. For example
